Report Overview

Desktop phones, also known as landline phones or office phones, are communication devices designed for fixed-line telephone networks, typically used in business environments for voice calls. These devices often feature advanced functionalities such as multi-line support, call forwarding, conferencing, voicemail integration, and compatibility with private branch exchange (PBX) systems. While mobile phones and VoIP (Voice over Internet Protocol) solutions have gained dominance in personal and business communication, desktop phones remain relevant in industries requiring high call volume, reliability, and compliance with traditional telephony infrastructure, such as call centers, healthcare, and government sectors.
