Guar gum (duck gum 800, emcogum CSAA, guar flour, guaran, gum cyamopsis, etc.) refers to a high molecular weight carbohydrate. Guar gum is an off white to yellow, odorless powder that is derived from the endosperm of natural seed of the guar plant. The seeds are dehusked, milled and screened to obtain powder. The powder is soluble in cold and hot water and almost insoluble in oils, greases, hydrocarbons, ketones, and esters. The product possesses a polymeric structure, which contains numerous hydroxyl groups.

The commercial production of guar gum normally uses roasting, differential attrition, sieving, and polishing.

Guar gum has a variety of industrial applications. The material is extensively used as a natural thickener, emulsifier, bonding agent, hydrocolloid, gelling agent, soil stabiliser, natural fiber, flocculants and fracturing agent.

Due to its health benefits, the organic guar gum is widely spread in different cuisines. Also, Guar gum decreases the risk of cholesterol and diabetes, enhances glucose tolerance, and regulates bowel movements. Besides, the product is good for weight management as it helps to achieve the feeling of fullness and to reduce hunger.

The guar gum may be irritating to skin, eyes, digestive and respiratory tract. The product may cause allergic reactions.

Country-wise, the market for guar gum is dominated by India and Pakistan. India accounts for about 80% of the global guar gum production.
