Abstracts

Sanitary pads, tampons, internal cleaners & sprays, panty liners & shields and disposable razors & blades, used for maintaining personal hygiene are collectively termed as feminine hygiene products. Amongst these, sanitary pads are majorly used products at the time of menstruation and are available in variety of sizes, shapes, and absorption levels. As these products provide exclusive protection against leakage, they are highly preferred by women. Since past few years, the feminine hygiene products market has witnessed significant growth, primarily in developing countries and is expected to witness notable growth in foreseeable years, owing to increasing personal health and hygiene concerns among individuals.

Rapid pace of urbanization and increased awareness about maintaining personal hygiene and health has boosted the demand for feminine hygiene products. Moreover, increase in number of working women in Asia-Pacific and Latin America, increasing preference for easy-to-use sanitary napkins and rising disposable income have propelled the growth of the feminine hygiene products market in the past few years. However, increasing health concerns due to the kind of raw materials being used in the hygiene products and ageing population in several countries are challenges for the industry growth. However, sanitary protection is under-penetrated in major developing
