Summary:

This study was conducted in response to the growing demand among patients for home health monitoring technology. The technologies used in home-based health monitoring are simplified and resemble those used in day-to-day communications. Doctors, patients or caregivers are very comfortable in using and operating these systems, and this is the unique selling point for home-based healthcare devices.

This study identifies the key advantages responsible for the growth of the home health monitoring business -

Freedom from long queues and waiting lists at out-patient department (OPDs) is a key advantage for patients.

Scaling ability to examine more patients per day is benefitting doctors at large.

Remote monitoring of patients and keeping tabs on their health from outside has opened new business avenues for home healthcare service providers and has enabled them to serve more patients via the same infrastructure.

BCC Research sees this ability to provide personalized healthcare services as becoming a key selling point for home health monitoring devices. The emerging applications such as continuous glucose monitoring or continuous heart rate monitoring have helped doctors and patients understand the health patterns of an individual person and are proving to be the best way to customize and personalize the healthcare services. This advantage of the upcoming line of continuous health monitoring devices is a key selling feature and is going to help these devices make great strides in the home healthcare market.

Report Scope:

The report will analyze the leading manufacturers of home health monitoring devices from the U.S., Europe, Asia-Pacific markets and emerging markets. The report will study these companies along various factors such as their last year's growth, research & development and future plans and forecasts through 2025. It will also identify the probable new entrants, emerging leaders and categories that will play a significant role in driving growth in the home health monitoring industry.
