Report Overview

2-Azido-2-deoxy-D-galactose is a chemically modified sugar derivative in which the hydroxyl group at the 2-position of D-galactose is replaced by an azido (-N₃) functional group. This modification makes it a valuable intermediate in carbohydrate chemistry, glycan synthesis, and bioconjugation applications, particularly in the development of glycoconjugate vaccines, glycomimetics, and probes for studying glycosylation processes. Its utility stems from its ability to participate in click chemistry reactions, such as the copper-catalyzed azide-alkyne cycloaddition (CuAAC), enabling efficient and selective labeling or attachment of biomolecules. The compound is primarily used in academic and pharmaceutical research, with niche demand driven by advancements in glycobiology, drug discovery, and diagnostics. Market dynamics are influenced by the growing emphasis on precision medicine and glycotherapeutics, though limited commercial availability and specialized application restrict its broad adoption. Key suppliers include fine chemical manufacturers and research reagent providers, with pricing reflecting its high purity and synthetic complexity. The market remains small but is expected to grow steadily as glycobiology gains traction in biopharmaceutical development.
