Report Overview

AKD (short for alkyl ketene dimer) is a fiber reactive sizing agent for papermaking under medium alkaline conditions. It is a replacement product of rosin series sizing agents. Its reaction mechanism is: AKD lotion particles (generally 0.2-2um) are fixed on the fiber surface with cationic starch polyacrylamide and other single or dual retention systems. During drying and storage, AKD molecules and hydroxyl groups on cellulose molecules undergo esterification reaction to complete the sizing process. It is suitable for the production of medium and high-end cultural paper such as writing paper, double adhesive paper, electrostatic copying paper, copperplate paper, as well as fruit bag paper, photographic base paper, packaging paper, and cardboard. Compared with acidic sizing agents, AKD neutral sizing agents can improve paper strength and toughness, improve printing suitability, and endow paper with good optical and stable chemical properties. They can also save long fiber raw materials, reduce pulp consumption, and reduce equipment corrosion.
