Abstracts

An Artificial Reef is a human-created structure designed to mimic the ecological functions of natural reefs, typically submerged in oceans, seas, or lakes to enhance marine biodiversity, protect coastlines, and support fisheries. These reefs can be constructed from various materials, such as concrete, steel, recycled materials (e.g., decommissioned ships or vehicles), or natural substances like rocks and coral fragments, often engineered to provide shelter, breeding grounds, and feeding areas for fish, invertebrates, and other aquatic organisms. Artificial reefs serve multiple purposes: they attract marine life, boost fish populations for recreational or commercial fishing, mitigate erosion by reducing wave energy, and even create underwater attractions for tourism, such as dive sites. They are strategically placed in areas where natural reefs have been degraded or destroyed by factors like pollution, overfishing, or climate change, helping to restore ecosystem health and productivity. Examples include purpose-built concrete modules, sunken oil rigs repurposed as reefs, or innovative designs like 3D-printed structures that mimic coral shapes. By enhancing habitat complexity, artificial reefs support a diverse range of species, from small crustaceans to large fish, and play a crucial role in marine conservation and sustainable ocean management.

The global Artificial Reef market size was estimated at USD 953.0 million in 2025 and is projected to grow at a compound annual growth rate (CAGR) of 6.20% during the forecast period.
