Report Overview

Buserelin acetate is a synthetic peptide analog of gonadotropin-releasing hormone (GnRH), primarily used in the treatment of hormone-responsive conditions such as prostate cancer, endometriosis, and central precocious puberty. It functions by initially stimulating the release of luteinizing hormone (LH) and follicle-stimulating hormone (FSH), followed by downregulation of GnRH receptors, leading to suppressed sex hormone production. The drug is administered via subcutaneous or intranasal routes and is valued for its efficacy in managing advanced hormone-dependent cancers and fertility-related disorders. As a therapeutic peptide, it holds a niche position in oncology and endocrinology markets, often prescribed as part of combination therapies or for long-term hormonal suppression. Market demand is driven by rising cancer prevalence, increasing awareness of reproductive health, and advancements in peptide-based treatments. However, competition from alternative GnRH analogs (e.g., leuprolide, goserelin) and biosimilars, alongside stringent regulatory requirements for peptide drugs, influences its market dynamics. Growth opportunities exist in emerging economies with expanding healthcare access and ongoing research into extended-release formulations.
