Abstracts

A cloud-native time series database is a database system designed specifically for storing, managing, and analyzing time series data. It makes full use of the characteristics of the cloud computing environment and is highly scalable, flexible, and efficient. Time series data refers to continuous data points in a time-based sequence, such as sensor data, monitoring data, and log records. Cloud-native time series databases are usually based on containerized architecture, microservice design, and automated operation and maintenance. They can achieve high-concurrency read and write operations in a distributed environment and can cope with large-scale data volumes and rapidly growing data streams. They use the elastic expansion capabilities of the cloud platform to dynamically expand resources according to demand, support horizontal expansion, and ensure high performance and high availability under different workloads. In addition, cloud-native time series databases usually have automated data management functions, such as data compression, deduplication, and lifecycle management, to optimize storage efficiency and query performance. In a cloud environment, cloud-native time series databases can easily integrate other cloud services, such as machine learning analysis, real-time monitoring, and big data processing, to provide users with powerful data analysis and decision support capabilities. This makes it have broad application prospects in the fields of the Internet of Things (IoT), real-time data analysis, financial market monitoring, and energy management. Cloud-native time series databases represent an important trend in the development of modern database architectures towards greater efficiency, flexibility, and scalability. In traditional time series databases, they often rely on a single hardware device and centralized storage, resulting in performance bottlenecks and lack of flexibility when facing large-scale, high-throughput, and rapidly growing data. Cloud-native time series databases solve these problems by combining the database architecture with the elastic and distributed characteristics of cloud computing. It can not only dynamically scale resources according to load, but also improve the maintainability and high availability of the system through containerization and microservices design. The key advantage of cloud-native time series databases lies in their high scalability and elasticity. It can handle a steady stream of big data streams from IoT devices, sensors, application logs, etc., and ensure the real-time and consistency of data through distributed storage and computing architecture. Compared with traditional databases, it can better cope with complex data patterns and query requirements while reducing hardware investment and operation and maintenance costs. Since cloud-native time series databases usually have built-in intelligent data compression and indexing technologies, they can effectively reduce storage requirements and optimize data retrieval speed. In addition, with the help of other services on the cloud platform (such as data analysis, machine learning, etc.), it can further enhance the value of data and achieve real-time decision-making and predictive analysis. In short, cloud-native time series databases not only represent the cutting-edge development of database technology, but are also a powerful tool for addressing today's challenges in large-scale time series data management and analysis. With the continuous development of cloud computing and the Internet of Things, its application prospects in industries such as energy, finance, and smart manufacturing will become more extensive.

The global Cloud-Native Time Series Database market size was estimated at USD 1650.0 million in 2025 and is projected to grow at a compound annual growth rate (CAGR) of 6.20% during the forecast period.
