Report Overview

Acrylonitrile (ACN) is an organic compound which is a colorless volatile liquid and is produced by ammonia catalysis of propylene. It has application in the production of homopolymers such as polyacrylonitrile and numerous copolymers such as styrene acrylonitrile (SAN), acrylonitrile styrene acrylate (ASA), acrylonitrile butadiene styrene (ABS) and synthetic rubbers. ABS is a thermoplastic, which is derived from acrylonitrile and exhibits the property of providing substantial weight reduction for automobiles. North America is likely to be a promising industry over the forecast period in light of presence of robust pharmaceutical manufacturing industries. Expansion of shale gas deposits and tight oil fields by the U.S. and Canada is likely to provide easy availability of petrochemical feedstock. The ease in availability of petrochemical feedstock as a raw material for the manufacturing of ACN is expected to fuel the industry growth in near future.
