Abstracts

Air logistics services, commonly known as air freight or air transport, refer to a modern logistics method that utilizes aircraft such as airplanes for cargo transportation. It is particularly suitable for transporting urgent, high-value, or time-sensitive goods, and its speed, safety, and punctuality have earned it a considerable market share. It significantly shortens delivery times and greatly promotes faster capital turnover and circulation in the logistics supply chain. Air logistics is not merely simple air transport; it has evolved into a strategic industrial system that utilizes air transport and other methods to achieve "door-to-door" physical flow of goods and extend related services, integrating multiple modes of transportation, warehousing, distribution, information, and other service functions. However, it is important to note that air freight is more expensive than other modes of transportation such as sea freight.The air logistics service industry has a promising future, expected to maintain steady growth and continue technological innovation. This growth is driven by the booming cross-border e-commerce and the increased logistics demand from the accelerated export of high-value-added products such as electric vehicles and industrial robots. Simultaneously, the industry is undergoing profound changes: on the one hand, Airbus predicts that the global freighter fleet will grow by 45% by 2045 to meet nearly double the demand for air freight; on the other hand, new technologies such as artificial intelligence, big data, automation, and digital freight platforms will be more widely applied to optimize routes, improve transparency, and enhance operational efficiency. Despite potential challenges from uncertainties such as geopolitical tensions and changes in trade policies, air logistics services, with their speed advantage, will play an increasingly prominent role as a core support for high-end manufacturing and rapid commerce in the future, driven by the global supply chain's pursuit of greater resilience and efficiency.

The global Air Logistics Services market size was estimated at USD 1212400.0 million
