Abstracts

Chorionic gonadotrophin (hCG) is a hormone-based pharmaceutical product derived from the urine of pregnant women or produced through recombinant DNA technology, primarily used in fertility treatments to stimulate ovulation in women and spermatogenesis in men, as well as in conjunction with human menopausal gonadotrophin (hMG) for assisted reproductive technologies like in vitro fertilization (IVF). It is also employed off-label in weight loss programs and sometimes misused in athletic and bodybuilding circles due to its perceived anabolic and testosterone-boosting effects, though such applications lack regulatory approval and carry significant health risks.
