Abstracts

Clean room cranes are lifting equipment specially designed for cleanroom environments. They are mainly used in places with extremely high requirements for environmental cleanliness, such as cleanrooms in semiconductor manufacturing, electronic chip production, biomedical research and development and production, aerospace parts manufacturing, precision instrument manufacturing and other industries. These cleanrooms usually require strict control of dust particles, microorganisms and other pollutants in the air to ensure product quality and the stability of the production process. When designing and manufacturing cleanroom cranes, materials with low dust generation, such as special stainless steel, aluminum alloy and high-performance plastics, will be selected to reduce dust particles generated by material wear and aging during equipment operation. In order to prevent external pollutants from entering the cleanroom and avoid the spread of pollutants that may be generated inside the equipment, the crane adopts a good sealing structure. For example, components such as motors and reducers are sealed to prevent lubricating oil leakage and internal dust overflow; moving parts such as tracks and wheels are also sealed to reduce dust generated during movement. The surface of the equipment is usually specially treated, such as a smooth coating or polishing treatment, so that the surface is not easy to absorb dust and pollutants, and is easy to clean and disinfect to maintain the clean environment of the cleanroom. The growing demand for purity products and the advancement of production technology have prompted companies to create a more precise and efficient production environment, increasing the demand for clean room cranes. At the same time, the application of new technologies such as artificial intelligence and the Internet of Things has improved the performance and maintenance efficiency of clean room cranes, and also promoted market development. In addition, global environmental protection and occupational health and safety standards have been strengthened, and companies need to invest in cleaner technologies and equipment.
