Abstracts

Cotton and cotton seed represent a globally significant agricultural commodity chain, with cotton primarily valued as the dominant natural fiber for textiles and apparel, while cotton seed is processed into three main products: cottonseed oil (a widely used edible oil), cottonseed meal (a high-protein animal feed), and linters (short fibers used in products like paper, plastics, and explosives). This market is characterized by its dual-purpose nature, linking the agricultural sector directly to both the consumer goods (textiles, food) and industrial supply chains, with production heavily concentrated in countries like China, India, the United States, Brazil, and Pakistan, and influenced by factors such as climate conditions, agricultural policies, global demand for apparel, bio-based materials, and plant-based proteins.
