Abstracts

Digital display advertising refers to the practice of placing visual promotional content?including banners, videos, rich media, and sponsored content?on websites, apps, and social media platforms, typically purchased through programmatic or direct sales channels and targeted to specific audiences based on demographics, interests, or behaviors. The market is characterized by rapid technological evolution, with increasing adoption of real-time bidding, artificial intelligence for optimization, and advanced audience segmentation techniques. It is a dominant segment within digital advertising, driven by the proliferation of digital media consumption, the shift from traditional to online channels, and the ability to deliver measurable ROI through precise targeting and performance tracking. Key players include major tech platforms like Google, Meta, and Amazon, as well as ad networks, demand-side platforms (DSPs), and publishers. Growth is fueled by trends such as mobile-first strategies, the rise of connected TV (CTV), and the integration of first-party data in response to privacy regulations. However, challenges like ad fraud, banner blindness, and increasing privacy restrictions continue to shape industry dynamics.
