Abstracts

Domestic waste treatment service refers to the process of collecting, classifying, transporting, treating and finally disposing of waste generated in daily life through a series of technical means and management measures. This business aims to reduce the pollution of waste to the environment and realize the resource utilization, harmlessness and reduction of waste. Common treatment methods include incineration, landfill, composting and recycling. Through scientific management and technological innovation, domestic waste treatment business not only improves the quality of urban environment, but also promotes the reuse of resources and the development of circular economy.Domestic waste treatment services cover collection, transportation, treatment and resource utilization, and the main technologies include landfill, incineration, composting and recycling. With the acceleration of urbanization, the global market continues to grow, among which incineration power generation has become the mainstream method, while landfill has gradually decreased due to environmental restrictions, and recycling and biological treatment technologies have attracted much attention due to their high added value.Regional development is differentiated: the European and American markets are mature, mainly based on efficient incineration and mandatory classification; the Asia-Pacific region is growing rapidly, and policies have promoted the expansion of incineration capacity; emerging markets have introduced advanced treatment models through public-private partnerships. In terms of technology, innovations such as intelligent sorting, waste energy and chemical recycling have accelerated industry upgrades, and the zero landfill goal has promoted the development of the circular economy.Policies are the core driving force, such as the EU's circular economy plan and China's "zero waste city" strategy, but challenges remain, including insufficient funds in developing countries, weak public awareness of classification, and the balance between technology costs and emission reduction targets in developed countries. Overall, the industry is transforming towards high efficiency, low carbon and
