The 2025 U.S. tariff policies introduce profound uncertainty into the global economic landscape. This report critically examines the implications of recent tariff adjustments and international strategic countermeasures on Electronic Measuring Instruments competitive dynamics, regional economic interdependencies, and supply chain reconfigurations.Measuring instruments are measuring instruments used to detect or measure a quantity, or provided for the purpose of measurement, including various indicator instruments, comparison instruments, recording instruments, signal sources, voltage stabilisation power supplies and sensors. Electronic measuring instruments are based on electronic technology and integrate multiple fields of technology to form a single machine or automatic test system, and use electricity, non-electricity and light as test objects to measure their parameters or control the state of operation of the system under test. The measurement function of electronic measuring instruments includes two major parts: one is qualitative testing, the purpose of which is to determine the performance of the target under specific conditions; the other is quantitative measurement, the purpose of which is to accurately measure the quantitative value of the target under test.In 2024, the global production of electronic measuring instruments will reach 910,500 units, with an average price range of 21,000 USD/Unit.Leading companies hold significant advantages in the global electronic measuring instrument market. Keysight Technologies, with its extensive product line, strong technical support, and global service network, holds a significant market share in high-end products such as oscilloscopes, spectrum analyzers, and signal generators. Rohde & Schwarz, renowned for its high quality and reliability, holds a strong position in communications testing, network analysis, and broadcast monitoring, with a product line covering everything from basic measurements to complex system testing. Anritsu excels in wireless communications testing, and its products play a key role in testing cutting-edge communications technologies such as 5G.In the Chinese domestic market, while
