Abstracts

Face Tracker can achieve real-time 3D facial expression capture, just need a video stream or webcam, and facial expressions can be tracked immediately. Facial recognition technology is versatile and is rapidly being adopted by a variety of end users. For example, in January 2020, electronic information technology company NEC announced that it would provide facial recognition technology to Japanese real estate company Mitsui Fudosan Co., Ltd. The offering includes smart hotel services, a solution that uses facial recognition technology. Additionally, the solution, with the help of facial recognition technology, will help users feel at ease when checking into a hotel. It will be used for various services including cashless payments, entertainment facilities, room access and check-in. The increasing adoption of facial recognition technology in various applications is the driving force for the market growth. Border authorities use the technology to verify identities, especially at airports. Law enforcement agencies also use facial recognition software to scan faces captured on CCTV and locate target individuals. Another application where this technology is widely adopted is in smartphones. In a smartphone, the software looks for apps used to unlock the phone, log into mobile apps and verify payments. For example, in January, Samsung's Galaxy Note 8 and 9 smartphone models and the iPhone X series were the most popular devices using facial recognition technology. Other smartphone devices like OnePlus 6, Oppo Find X, MotoG6, Huawei Honor 7X, and LG G7 use 2D technology and iris scanners to scan the user's face. iPhone X Face ID consists of a depth sensor, dot projector, and infrared camera that maps 30,000 dots on the user's face. From this data, the software develops a human 3D scan that securely unlocks the phone and authenticates digital payments through Apple Pay. The increasing adoption of this technology by law enforcement agencies has significantly contributed to the growth of the market. For example, in January 2020, the city of Moscow announced the use of real-time facial recognition cameras provided by NtechLab, a developer of artificial intelligence algorithms. The city's police authorities will use facial recognition technology to search for suspects through live cameras. When a match is found, the software notifies police. In another example, MorphoTrust, a subsidiary of IDEMIA and one of the most prominent providers of biometric products and services in the United States, develops facial recognition systems for state and federal law enforcement agencies, state DMVs, state government departments, and airports.
