Abstracts

Ferritin testing services are clinical diagnostic procedures that measure the concentration of ferritin—a protein that stores iron and releases it in a controlled manner—in a patient's blood serum, providing a highly sensitive and specific indicator of the body's iron stores; these tests are essential for diagnosing and monitoring conditions such as iron deficiency anemia, iron overload disorders (like hemochromatosis), chronic inflammation, liver disease, and certain malignancies, with the service encompassing sample collection, laboratory analysis using methods like immunoassays (e.g., ELISA or chemiluminescence), result interpretation, and reporting, often integrated into broader health screenings or ordered as standalone tests by healthcare providers.
