Abstracts

The market for geriatric care at home encompasses a range of non-medical and medical support services designed to assist elderly individuals in maintaining independence, safety, and quality of life within their own residences, rather than transitioning to institutional care settings such as nursing homes or assisted living facilities. These services typically include personal care (e.g., bathing, dressing, meal preparation), companionship, medication management, mobility assistance, and light housekeeping, often delivered by professional caregivers, certified nursing assistants, or licensed healthcare providers depending on the level of need. The sector is driven by demographic trends, including an aging global population, increasing life expectancy, and a growing preference among seniors to age in place, supported by technological advancements such as remote monitoring devices, telehealth platforms, and caregiver coordination software that enhance service delivery and oversight. Additionally, factors like rising healthcare costs, limited capacity in long-term care facilities, and government policies favoring home- and community-based services over institutional care contribute to market expansion, though challenges such as workforce shortages, reimbursement complexities, and varying regulatory standards across regions persist. The competitive landscape includes both large franchised providers and localized agencies, with growing involvement from technology firms developing solutions to improve care coordination, safety, and efficiency.

The global Geriatric Care At Home market size was estimated at USD 520.75 million in 2024 and is projected to grow at a compound annual growth rate (CAGR) of 5.20% during the forecast period.
