Abstracts

The 2025 U.S. tariff policies introduce profound uncertainty into the global economic landscape. This report critically examines the implications of recent tariff adjustments and international strategic countermeasures on Hausmannite competitive dynamics, regional economic interdependencies, and supply chain reconfigurations. Hausmannite is a naturally occurring manganese oxide mineral with the chemical formula  $Mn_2O_3$ , typically forming dark brown to black tetragonal crystals. It is an important intermediate ore in the manganese value chain, commonly found in association with other manganese minerals such as pyrolusite and braunite. The supply chain of hausmannite begins with mining operations in manganese-rich regions like South Africa, Gabon, Brazil, India, and Australia, where it is extracted as part of mixed manganese ores. The raw ore undergoes beneficiation processes such as crushing, washing, and gravity separation to concentrate manganese oxide fractions. From there, it moves into smelting and refining facilities where it serves as a feedstock for the production of electrolytic manganese dioxide (EMD), silicomanganese, and other manganese alloys. These downstream products are critical inputs for the steel industry (deoxidizers and alloying agents), battery manufacturing (particularly for alkaline and lithium-ion batteries), chemical catalysts, ceramics, and pigments, making hausmannite an essential link in the global manganese supply chain. The Hausmannite industry sustains an annual production of approximately 2.9 million tons, supported by a global installed capacity of nearly 3.8 million tons per year, ensuring steady supply for steel, battery, and chemical applications. With an average market price of around USD 310 per ton, the sector operates at a healthy gross margin of about 22%.

The global Hausmannite market size was estimated at USD 892.0 million in 2025 and is projected to grow at a compound annual growth rate (CAGR) of 3.80% during the forecast period.
