Abstracts

Human resources due diligence refers to a comprehensive review and assessment of the target company's "human capital" related elements prior to transactions such as corporate mergers and acquisitions, investments or integrations. Its core purpose is to identify, evaluate and quantify potential risks, liabilities and value drivers related to human resources, such as organizational structure and cultural compatibility, retention risks of key talent, compliance with labor contracts, sustainability of compensation and benefits systems, potential liabilities such as pensions and options, and pending labor litigation, thereby providing key decision-making basis for transaction valuation, negotiation and post-transaction integration planning, ensuring that the value of human capital is preserved and synergy is achieved. The future of HR due diligence is evolving from a supplementary process into a core element determining the success or failure of corporate strategy. In an increasingly complex business environment, especially with the normalization of mergers and acquisitions, investment and financing, and cross-industry cooperation, companies are increasingly recognizing that "people" are the most valuable and risky core asset within an organization. Therefore, HR due diligence is no longer limited to traditional employee roster verification and contract compliance review; its value is deeply integrated into the forefront of strategic investment assessment and risk management. It proactively focuses on soft power aspects such as the health of the talent structure, the stability of the core team, the compatibility of corporate culture, and the effectiveness of the incentive system, aiming to accurately quantify talent risks, predict the difficulty of post-merger integration, and ensure a smooth transition of organizational effectiveness. In the future, this field will place greater emphasis on data-driven decision-making, using professional analytical models to assess team combat effectiveness and the probability of cultural integration. Simultaneously, the boundaries between this field and HR value-added services such as salary surveys, long-term incentive design, and change management are gradually blurring, forming integrated solutions. Ultimately, high-end HR due diligence services that deeply integrate business insights, psychology, and legal knowledge will become a key pillar helping companies avoid transaction pitfalls and realize investment value, with continued growth in market potential.
