Abstracts

Infant and baby car seats are specialized safety devices designed to transport newborns and young children in motor vehicles, engineered to provide optimal protection during travel by restraining the child securely and mitigating the impact of collisions through features such as energy-absorbing foam, reinforced frames, and multi-point harness systems. These seats are categorized primarily by age, weight, and height specifications, with infant carriers (rear-facing only) intended for newborns up to approximately 12-15 months or 13-16 kg (depending on regional standards), while convertible or all-in-one models accommodate both rear-facing infants and forward-facing toddlers, adhering to stringent international safety regulations such as FMVSS 213 in the U.S. and ECE R44/04 or R129 (i-Size) in Europe. Product variations include base systems for easier installation, side-impact protection, adjustable recline positions, and compatibility with stroller travel systems, emphasizing convenience alongside core safety requirements.
