Report Overview

Natural graphite is graphite that is formed by Nature. Natural graphite is an important industrial mineral which finds applications in almost every facet of manufacturing including electronics, atomic energy, hot metal processing, friction, coatings, aerospace, powder metallurgy, etc. However not every form of natural graphite is suitable for every application to which natural graphite is applied. Differences in bulk and particle morphology, purity, and constraints on processing (grinding, screening, etc) make certain varieties more suitable for certain applications than others. The following sections of this article will describe the three types of natural graphite from a mineralogical and industrial point of view with the goal of providing users and potential users of these materials a basic understanding of the characteristics that distinguish each type of natural graphite from one another.

Natural graphite is available in three forms, all of which are processed from naturally sourced graphite material. The three forms are amorphous graphite, flake graphite and crystalline vein graphite, and they each have unique properties that make them well-suited for certain applications.
