Abstracts

Platform-mediated gig economy refers to a model of the gig economy where digital platforms act as intermediaries to connect freelancers and demand-side users. Unlike traditional employment relationships, this model relies on digital tools and technologies to offer flexible labor arrangements. The platform plays multiple roles, such as facilitating transactions, managing payment settlements, and providing feedback mechanisms, which promotes the efficient operation of the labor market. The platform itself does not directly employ workers but instead creates an open marketplace where supply and demand parties can negotiate and reach agreements independently.The product range of platform-mediated gig economy is extensive, covering tasks from simple assignments to complex professional services. Common industries include, but are not limited to, food delivery, ride-sharing, home cleaning, freelancing, tutoring, and temporary project management. Key services offered by the platform include task posting, online payment, identity verification, task matching, and dispute resolution. Compared to traditional employment models, platform-mediated gig economy provides significant flexibility, where workers can choose tasks based on their time and interests, while employers can quickly find suitable personnel based on their needs. Additionally, platforms often offer data analytics and personalized recommendations to enhance work efficiency and service quality.In this model, platforms such as Uber, Lyft, Airbnb, and Fiverr are typical examples. They leverage the advantages of digital platforms to redefine the labor market and service industries.
