Report Overview

Securities lending is a financial practice where securities, such as stocks or bonds, are temporarily transferred from one party (the lender) to another (the borrower) in exchange for collateral, typically cash or other securities. The borrower pays a fee for the loan and is obligated to return the securities at a later date, often with additional interest or dividends if applicable. This market plays a critical role in enhancing liquidity, enabling short selling, and supporting arbitrage strategies, while also providing income opportunities for institutional investors like pension funds and mutual funds.

The global securities lending market is driven by demand from hedge funds, prime brokers, and market makers, with regulatory frameworks, counterparty risk, and market volatility influencing its dynamics. Technological advancements and automation have streamlined processes, while regulatory scrutiny post-financial crisis has shaped risk management practices. The industry continues to evolve with the rise of passive investing and ESG considerations impacting lending activity.
