Report Overview

Spermaceti wax is a high-quality, white, and odorless wax derived from the head cavity of the sperm whale (Physeter macrocephalus). It is primarily composed of the fatty substance called cetyl palmitate and is known for its exceptional hardness, stability, and melting point. Historically, spermaceti wax was used in candle making, as it produced a bright, smokeless flame and was highly prized for its purity and burn quality. In addition to its use in candles, it has been employed in various applications such as cosmetics, pharmaceuticals, and as a component in the production of high-quality lubricants and polishes. Due to the decline in sperm whale populations and the implementation of international whaling bans, the use of spermaceti wax has significantly decreased, and it has been largely replaced by synthetic alternatives.
