Abstracts

Video conference services are digital platforms that enable real-time, interactive audio and video communication between two or more participants across different geographical locations, typically delivered via the internet and accessible through devices such as computers, smartphones, and dedicated meeting room systems; these services often include supplementary features such as screen sharing, virtual backgrounds, chat functions, recording capabilities, and integration with productivity and scheduling tools, serving a broad range of use cases from corporate meetings and remote collaboration to educational instruction, telehealth consultations, and social gatherings. The market for video conference services has experienced exponential growth, driven by the global shift toward remote and hybrid work models, increased adoption of digital communication tools across industries, and advancements in cloud infrastructure and network reliability; key players include established tech giants like Zoom, Microsoft (Teams), Google (Meet), and Cisco (Webex), as well as specialized providers targeting niche segments with enhanced security, enterprise-grade features, or industry-specific compliance.
