Abstracts

A video streaming platform is an online service platform that delivers video content to users in real time via the internet, based on streaming media technology. It eliminates the need for users to download entire files, allowing playback while streaming, significantly reducing storage pressure and waiting time, and supporting access from multiple devices. The platform's core comprises three main modules: content supply, technical support, and user services. Technically, it relies on encoding/decoding, CDN distribution, and bandwidth control to ensure smooth playback; on the server side, it monetizes through membership systems, advertising, and pay-per-view. Breaking the traditional time and space limitations of television, it meets users' personalized and fragmented viewing needs, and has become the mainstream carrier of digital content consumption, driving the video content industry towards digitalization and interactivity.The global video streaming platform landscape is characterized by "global giants dominating and regional platforms emerging." The North American market is led by Netflix, Disney+, and Prime Video, who hold a dominant position thanks to high-quality original IP and mature membership systems. The European market features both international platform penetration and competition from local services. Emerging markets in the Asia-Pacific, Latin America, and Middle East and Africa are experiencing rapid growth, with regional platforms breaking through by offering localized content. These emerging markets, driven by well-developed digital infrastructure, widespread mobile device adoption, and a young population, have become the core growth engines of the global streaming industry, propelling the market towards diversification.

The global Video Streaming Platform market size was estimated at USD 21930.0 million in 2025 and is projected to grow at a compound annual growth rate (CAGR) of 7.60% during the forecast period.
