Report Overview

Houttuynia Cordata Injection is a traditional Chinese medicine (TCM) injection derived from the herb Houttuynia cordata, known for its anti-inflammatory, antiviral, and immune-boosting properties. It is primarily used in China to treat respiratory infections, pneumonia, and other inflammatory conditions. The product falls under the broader TCM injectable market, which has faced scrutiny due to safety concerns but remains significant due to its widespread use in Chinese hospitals. Demand is driven by its perceived efficacy in treating viral infections, including during the COVID-19 pandemic, where some practitioners incorporated it into treatment protocols. However, regulatory challenges, adverse reaction risks, and competition from Western alternatives impact market growth. The domestic market is dominated by Chinese pharmaceutical companies, with limited international penetration due to regulatory barriers and skepticism outside TCM-adopting regions. Pricing, reimbursement policies, and clinical evidence will shape its future adoption.
