Report Overview

The kids? digital advertising market refers to the targeted promotion of products, services, or brands to children (typically under 12 years old) through digital channels such as mobile apps, websites, streaming platforms, social media, and in-game advertising. This sector leverages interactive and engaging content, including videos, gamified ads, and influencer collaborations, to capture children's attention while adhering to strict regulatory frameworks like COPPA (Children's Online Privacy Protection Act) in the U.S. and GDPR-K in the EU, which govern data collection and ad targeting practices. Advertisers focus on kid-friendly categories such as toys, educational tools, snacks, and entertainment, while balancing ethical concerns around screen time, persuasive marketing, and parental oversight. The rise of connected devices, streaming services, and child-centric apps has expanded opportunities, though brands must navigate parental preferences for ad-free or low-ad experiences, as well as growing scrutiny over digital privacy and age-appropriate content.
