Abstracts

Online dental services, a branch of telemedicine, involve providing dental care, consultation, education, and other services to patients through information technology and telecommunications. These services are typically delivered through real-time video calls, instant messaging, or photo/video uploads. Patients can communicate from home or another convenient location via a computer, mobile phone, or other device. Based on the patient's description and provided oral photos or videos, the doctor will provide a preliminary diagnosis, treatment recommendations, and prescriptions. AI - assisted diagnosis can analyze oral imaging data to automatically identify dental caries, periodontal disease, and other lesions, improving the accuracy of diagnosis. 3D printing and CBCT imaging are used to precisely manufacture dental implants, invisible braces, etc., shortening the treatment cycle. 5G technology enables real - time image transmission and operation guidance in remote consultations and surgical guidance. The service models of online dental services are becoming more and more diverse. In addition to remote consultation services, digital orthodontic services that combine 3D scanning and AI modeling to provide personalized tooth correction plans are also rapidly rising. Growing demand for preventive care: With the enhancement of people's oral health awareness, the demand for preventive oral care services is increasing. Online dental service platforms can provide users with personalized preventive care suggestions based on big data, such as children's caries prevention projects, regular inspection reminders, etc., promoting the transformation of the oral industry from a "treatment - centered" to a comprehensive service model of "prevention + experience + efficiency".
