Report Overview

Refined dog skin plaster is a traditional Chinese medicinal product made from processed dog skin, often combined with herbs and other natural ingredients, and used topically to relieve pain, inflammation, and muscle or joint discomfort. Historically valued in Chinese medicine for its purported warming and blood-activating properties, the plaster is typically applied to areas affected by arthritis, rheumatism, or injuries to promote circulation and healing. However, its production and use have become increasingly controversial due to ethical concerns over animal welfare, shifting consumer preferences toward cruelty-free alternatives, and stricter regulations on animal-derived medicinal products. While still available in some Asian markets, demand has declined in regions with strong animal rights movements or bans on dog-related products, leading to a shrinking niche market dominated by older consumers loyal to traditional remedies. The industry faces challenges from synthetic and plant-based pain relief patches, which are gaining traction as sustainable and ethical substitutes. Market growth is further hindered by limited scientific validation of efficacy and growing scrutiny from international regulatory bodies.

This report provides a deep insight into the global Refined Dog Skin Plaster market covering all its essential aspects.
