During Q214 Brazilian Defence Minister Celso Amorim toured Angola, Mozambique and South Africa with the aim of enhancing cooperation in areas such as cyber-security, military training and military intelligence. Concluding his visit to Mozambique, Defence Minister Amorim announced the donation of three ex-Brazilian Air Force Embraer EMB-312 Tucano trainer aircraft and possible financing of three Super Tucanos to boost the operational and combat capacity of the Mozambican armed forces. It was also announced that Brazil would dispatch a delegation to Mozambique to help develop naval bases and naval training facilities. The development of these defence ties signifies a concerted effort by Brazil to extend its soft power across the African continent.

As a global mega-event, the FIFA World Cup can in many ways be understood as an exercise in enhancing Brazilian soft power. The World Cup gives Brazil the chance to demonstrate its vitality as an emerging power to the world. A safe and secure tournament, free from domestic turmoil and insecurity, is seen as an important way in which to consolidate this image. However, BMI believes that public demonstrations and domestic unrest poses a serious threat to both security as well as this image of vitality.
