Speaking in June 2014, German defence minister Ursula von der Leyen announced plans for Germany to increase the share of the country's Gross Domestic Product which is spent on defence. At the moment, Germany spends just over one percent of its GDP on defence. In addition, she argued that NATO's two percent non-binding figure was less important than how the money was spent, adding that the sharing of common capabilities across Europe could be one mechanism by which Germany and its neighbours can save money vis-à-vis defence procurement.

The value of arms export licences granted by the German government increased significantly in 2013 according to reports published in June 2014. In 2013 the government approved a total of 17,280 arms export applications. This was an increase of 900 licences compared to the previous year. The report continued that 38 percent of German arms exports performed in 2013 were to countries outside the European Union and NATO.
