BMI View: The South East Asian region has shown a high level of stability in recent years, with rational diplomacy trumping hotheadedness. Only Sino-Philippine disputes over the Paracel, and other, islands, show significant friction. Jakarta's positive relations with both Beijing and its fellow ASEAN members may result in an ever-more significant role for Indonesia in the region. Military modernization continues apace, furthering Indonesia's advantage over its neighbours, although internal issues are of greater concern than overseas ones.

For its part, Jakarta has good relations with Beijing. However, the Indonesian side has expressed concern over some Chinese activities in the South China Sea, and Beijing must tread carefully in order to remain on good terms with South East Asia's key state. Indeed, Indonesian pressure will be critical in ensuring that China follows through on its promise to come to the table to negotiate a new Code of Conduct for the South China Sea, although progress to date has been limited, despite the best intentions of Jakarta and Washington, amongst others.
