BMI View: Following the collapse of peace talks between the government and the Pakistan Taliban, and the decision to begin a military offensive in North Waziristan, we expect an escalation in domestic security threats through 2014 and into 2015. The government plans to deploy 150,000 troops to the region until 2017, which will increase pressure on military resources. The government has increased the defence budget for the current financial year, but additional funds may be required to quell the heightened security threat. Meanwhile, the increased cost of supplying the army in its ground offensive could detract funds away from the military procurement programme.

Defence spending is highly skewed in favour of the Pakistan Army, which is the primary branch of the armed forces. Meanwhile, the Pakistan Navy and Pakistan Air Force play a smaller role in national defence given the nature of strategic threats, which are primarily land based. However, defence chiefs have highlighted weakness in air and naval hardware in Pakistan, which is losing ground to India with regards to overall military capability. As a result, aircraft, ship, and submarine purchases dominate the current procurement plan.
