Abstracts

This report provides an overview of creatine's production and price in China in the past few years, covering survey findings on the following aspects: who are the major producers of creatine in the country; what are historical product prices and trends; which factors are influencing decision of investing in creatine production.

Generally, capacity and output of creatine in China kept stable in 2013 and 2014, and the former has kept unchanged in 2015 so far. Actually, the production distribution has gone through some changes these years. Eastern China has been the dominant area for creatine production; meanwhile, the production has already expanded to western part of the country. Producers in both areas have their own problems to be solved for keeping future development.

Along with the production expansion and entrance of new producers, price of creatine has shown a downtrend in the past three years, as both product supply and industry competition increased. Considering the increasing cost and joining of potential entrants, the creatine price in China is likely to keep stable in the coming few years.

In the future, the production scale will be enlarging, as new production lines can be tracked down. Industry competition will become stiffer in the future.

The following data and analysis are unveiled in this report:

Capacity and output of creatine in China, 2013-H1 2015;

Production expansion from the east to the west and characteristics of producers in both areas;

List of major producers and details including capacity & output (2013-H1 2015), general description of creatine production and other aspects;

Historical price of creatine monohydrate in China in 2012-2014 and current price in the first eight months of 2015;

Summary of production situation and suggestions on investments.
