Executive Summary

‘Subsea’ prefix is used for under-water facilities for oil and gas production. These under-water facilities together with the engineering, manufacturing and installation of umbilical's, risers, and flow lines, as well as associated services are often abbreviated as "SURF". In order to meet increasing demand for energy, exploration and production activities have shifted to more challenging deeper water environment. Development of new reserves at higher depths has driven the scale and complexity of SURF projects globally.

Factors such as rising demand for oil and gas worldwide, increase in oil and gas prices, growth in regions like Middle East and Asia Pacific and improving global economic conditions are driving the growth of global SURF market. However due to high complexity of deepwater developments, challenging new reserves, reduced access to resources, high exploration and production capital expenditure and depletion of oil & gas reserves pull back growth of the industry. The prominent market trends in the industry are increased exploration in higher water depths/deepwater developments, building up of Floating Production or Storage Systems (FPS) and development of rig count worldwide.
