Research Summary

Butylated hydroxytoluene (BHT) is a synthetic antioxidant commonly used as a food additive and preservative to prevent the oxidation of fats and oils, thereby extending the shelf life of processed foods and cosmetics. It is a white, crystalline powder or a waxy solid with a slightly phenolic odor. BHT works by inhibiting the formation of free radicals, which can cause rancidity and spoilage in foods and degradation in cosmetics. In addition to its role as a food preservative, BHT is also used in industrial applications, such as in rubber and petroleum products, as an antioxidant to prevent degradation. However, there is some controversy surrounding BHT due to its potential health effects, including concerns about its possible carcinogenicity and endocrine-disrupting properties. Regulatory agencies have set limits on the amount of BHT that can be used in food and cosmetics, and it is generally considered safe for use within these limits.

The major global manufacturers of Butylated Hydroxytoluene (BHT) include BASF, MOLEKULA, DuPont, Cargill, Oxiris, LANXESS, Impextraco, Lark Group, Eastman, Bioceutisch, Haihua Chemical Technology, etc. The global players competition
