Research Summary

Copper clad laminate (CCL) is a composite material widely used in the electronics industry for the fabrication of printed circuit boards (PCBs). It consists of a thin layer of copper foil bonded to one or both sides of a rigid or flexible substrate material. The substrate is typically made of fiberglass-reinforced epoxy resin, but other materials like paper, phenolic resin, or polyimide can also be used depending on the application. The copper foil provides the conductive pathways for electrical signals, while the substrate offers mechanical support and insulation. Copper clad laminates are available in various thicknesses, copper weights, and substrate types, allowing for different PCB design and manufacturing requirements. They are crucial for the construction of high-performance electronic devices and play a significant role in ensuring reliable signal transmission and interconnection in modern electronic products ranging from smartphones and computers to automotive electronics and aerospace systems.

The major global manufacturers of Copper Clad Laminate include KBL, SYTECH, Panasonic, Nan Ya plastic, GDM, DOOSAN, ITEQ, Showa Denko Materials, EMC,
