Research Summary

Curdlan gum is a naturally occurring polysaccharide produced by bacteria, particularly Agrobacterium species, through fermentation. Chemically, it is composed of repeating units of glucose linked together in a linear β -(1 \rightarrow 3)-D-glucan structure. Curdlan gum is unique in its ability to form rigid gels upon heating, making it valuable in various food and industrial applications as a gelling agent, thickener, and stabilizer. It has excellent gelling properties, forming strong, elastic gels at relatively low concentrations and under mild conditions. In the food industry, curdlan gum is used in products such as sauces, soups, bakery items, and dairy products to improve texture, stability, and mouthfeel. Additionally, it finds applications in pharmaceuticals, cosmetics, and other industries where gelling and thickening properties are desired. Curdlan gum is often favored for its natural origin, clean label status, and ability to create unique textures in food products.
