Research Summary

A currency sorting machine is a sophisticated device used to sort and manage large quantities of banknotes or currency efficiently. It is commonly used in banks, cash processing centers, and other financial institutions to handle bulk cash transactions. Currency sorting machines are designed to quickly and accurately detect and separate different denominations of banknotes, removing damaged or counterfeit bills from circulation. They use advanced technologies such as image recognition, ultraviolet (UV) and infrared (IR) detection, magnetic ink (MG) detection, and serial number reading to identify and categorize each banknote. The machine can organize the banknotes into different stacks based on denomination and orientation, and it can also detect and reject any counterfeit or damaged notes. Currency sorting machines play a vital role in improving the efficiency of cash handling processes, reducing manual errors, and ensuring the authenticity and quality of currency in circulation.
