Research Summary

Facade sandwich panels are building construction materials used to create exterior cladding for buildings. These panels consist of multiple layers, typically an outer and inner skin, with a core material sandwiched between them. The outer skin can be made of various materials like metal, wood, or composite materials, while the inner skin provides structural support. The core material can be insulation, such as foam or mineral wool, which helps improve thermal efficiency and sound insulation of the building. Facade sandwich panels are known for their versatility, as they offer a combination of aesthetics, insulation, and structural strength.
