Research Summary

Hyperbaric Oxygen Therapy (HBOT) chambers are specialized enclosures designed to administer medical treatment involving the inhalation of pure oxygen in a pressurized environment. These chambers come in various designs, including monoplace chambers designed for a single patient and multiplace chambers capable of accommodating multiple individuals simultaneously. During a hyperbaric oxygen therapy session, the atmospheric pressure inside the chamber is increased to levels higher than normal, allowing patients to breathe 100% oxygen. This pressurized oxygen is absorbed into the bloodstream, promoting enhanced oxygen delivery to tissues and facilitating various therapeutic effects. HBOT is utilized for conditions such as decompression sickness, chronic non-healing wounds, radiation injuries, and certain infections. The controlled environment in hyperbaric oxygen therapy chambers is crucial for achieving the therapeutic benefits associated with increased pressure and oxygen levels, contributing to improved healing and recovery in patients.
