Research Summary

A metal sandwich panel is a composite building material consisting of two outer metal sheets (typically aluminum, steel, or other metals) bonded to a lightweight core material (such as polyethylene, mineral wool, or foam) in between. These panels are widely used in construction for walls, roofs, ceilings, and partitions due to their lightweight, high strength, and thermal insulation properties. Metal sandwich panels offer several advantages, including ease of installation, durability, fire resistance, and sound insulation. They come in various thicknesses, sizes, and surface finishes to suit different architectural and functional requirements.
