Research Summary

Polyetheretherketone (PEEK) is a high-performance thermoplastic polymer known for its exceptional mechanical, thermal, and chemical properties. It belongs to the family of polyaryletherketones and is widely used in demanding industrial applications. PEEK exhibits high temperature resistance, excellent mechanical strength, and outstanding chemical resistance, making it suitable for use in harsh environments. It has low flammability, high dimensional stability, and is resistant to abrasion and wear. PEEK is commonly employed in aerospace, automotive, medical, and oil and gas industries for applications such as seals, bearings, electrical connectors, medical implants, and components in aggressive chemical environments. Its versatility and ability to maintain mechanical properties at elevated temperatures contribute to its popularity as an engineering thermoplastic in various critical applications where reliability and performance are paramount.
