Research Summary

Polypropylene is a commonly used material in the production of absorbent hygiene products, which include items like diapers, sanitary napkins, and incontinence pads. In these products, polypropylene is often employed as a component of the nonwoven fabric that forms the outer and inner layers. Nonwoven materials made from polypropylene fibers provide excellent softness, breathability, and liquid absorption properties. Polypropylene's hydrophobic nature helps to keep moisture away from the skin, enhancing the comfort of the user. Additionally, the material's strength and durability contribute to the overall performance of absorbent hygiene products, ensuring that they can withstand usage without compromising their structural integrity. The versatility, cost-effectiveness, and hygienic properties of polypropylene make it a preferred choice in the manufacturing of absorbent products designed for personal care and hygiene.
