Research Summary

Resin Coated Copper Foil (RCC) is a specialized material used in the manufacturing of printed circuit boards (PCBs). It involves a thin layer of copper foil that is coated or laminated with a resin material, typically epoxy or polyimide, on one or both sides. This coating serves multiple purposes, such as providing insulation, enhancing the stability of the copper, and protecting it from environmental factors. The resin coating also contributes to the overall flexibility and durability of the copper foil, making it suitable for applications where flexibility and high-performance electrical properties are crucial. RCC is particularly valued in the electronics industry for its use in flexible printed circuit boards (FPCBs) and rigid-flex PCBs, where the combination of copper conductivity and resin insulation is essential for creating reliable and compact electronic components.
