Research Summary

Slate is a fine-grained metamorphic rock that forms from the compression and metamorphism of sedimentary shale or mudstone. It is characterized by its smooth, flat surface, distinct foliation, and ability to split into thin, durable sheets, making it highly suitable for roofing, flooring, and cladding applications. Slate typically exhibits a range of colors, including shades of gray, green, blue, black, and purple, depending on the mineral composition and geological conditions during formation. Due to its natural beauty, durability, and resistance to water, frost, and heat, slate has been used as a building material for centuries, particularly in roofing tiles, where it provides excellent protection against the elements and can last for decades or even centuries with proper maintenance.
